In this talk, the author will outline recent developments in kernel methods with mixed data models, i.e., models having a mix of categorical and continuous data types. The approach presented has a number of appealing features, including automatic dimensionality reduction in the presence of irrelevant covariates, and the ability to handle a relatively large number of covariates in mixed data settings. A framework for estimation and inference is outlined, and extensions will be discussed.